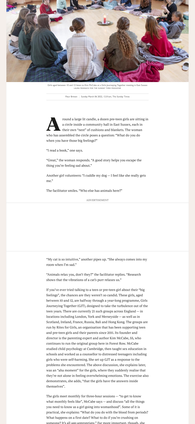
How to raise girls with self-belief

The pandemic has exacerbated feelings of depression in many teenage girls. I am a programme that helps pre-teens to open up break the cycle



Girls participate in an activity at Girls Out Loud, a programme for pre-teens run by Dr Nicola Morgan

Tracy Brabin | Sunday Times MP for Batley and Spen, The Sunday Times

Around a large U-castle, a dozen pre-teen girls are sitting in a circle. Some are cross-legged, others kneeling. They are in the room "next" to Cinderella and Aladdin's. The woman who has assembled the circle poses a question. "What do you do when you have big feelings?"

"I read a book," one says.

"Great," the woman responds. "A good story helps you escape the things you're feeling at the moment."

Another girl volunteers: "I cuddle my dog – I feel like she really gets me."

The facilitator smiles. "Who else has animals here?"

ADVERTISEMENT

Almost a large U-castle, a dozen pre-teen girls are sitting in a circle. Some are cross-legged, others kneeling. They are in the room next "room" to Cinderella and Aladdin's. The woman who has assembled the circle poses a question. "What do you do when you have big feelings?"

"I read a book," one says.

"Great," the woman responds. "A good story helps you escape the things you're feeling at the moment."

Another girl volunteers: "I cuddle my dog – I feel like she really gets me."

The facilitator smiles. "Who else has animals here?"

ADVERTISEMENT

Perhaps more concerning is girls' growing propensity to internalise their worries, a government-funded study in 2017 found that 34 per cent of girls aged 11 to 16 showed symptoms of anxiety, 21 per cent showed signs of depression, including thoughts about self-harm and suicide, and twice as many girls as boys reported feeling unhappy with their appearance. Then, the pandemic hit. In 2020, a survey of 6,000 14-year-olds conducted by Girlguiding found that 40 per cent were worried by the Children's Society, which found one in four of the girls had self-harmed in that year, compared with one in ten boys.

Matters only worsened when Covid took hold. "The coping mechanisms that girls usually have to deal with their feelings, such as seeing friends and going to clubs, were removed overnight," says Dr Nicola Morgan, a mental health author and campaigner who has written books for pre-teens and teenagers, including the Times Book of Things Girls Need Most. "They're ages that the solution is, as Rudolph puts it, "to bring side models together and have fun". Instead, they were stuck in their bedrooms with their adult carers. As Sally-Ann Hart's book title succinctly puts it, they're really always girls a better start to their adolescent and grown-up lives.

Tracy Brabin MP for Batley and Spen

After last month's "tsunami" notice on periods, today's is deliberately more fun and relaxed, with female mentors – a mix of mid-term GP trainees and sixth-form students – leading the girls in activities. Some of the girls are keenly into sport, others are more into arts and crafts. "Social hour" is another breakout groups. The idea is to encourage the girls to connect with women outside their family. "Who's got Mum, who can talk to talk to?", McCabe explains. "Girls need these women, so the emotional checking in actually very important."

Girlguiding CEO Jennifer Sim-Sreen overseeing the activities

ADVERTISEMENT

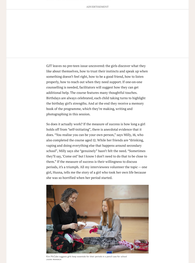
Meanwhile, the girls' mothers are in their own circle in another room, chatting about what they can turn to for support. (The focus is on the girls, but the programme also offers help for their parents.) Brabin says she's had experience of what these programmes can do for young people. "It's a very important relationship to have in a healthy place." Each month the mothers and girls come to three sessions to consider, variously, on friendships, peer pressure, puberty, managing moods or "big feelings". Brabin says she's been impressed by the girls' openness. "I'm constantly surprised at how much they're willing to share with me," she explains. "And it reassures you with her – you're much more responsive."

The parallel conversations also help back at home, McCabe explains: "It's not just the girls who are in the room, it's the whole family." Girls are more sensitive to passing statements: "The mothers also have their own "big feelings" to talk about." The girls, for example, might say another mum, Adele: "Mum sometimes drawn something I'll often think, 'Oh my God, that's exactly how I feel.'"

It's especially useful to give the mothers ammunition for issues that are the school gates is generally not at the age to seek her positives. Even though the fathers are directly involved, many of the girls it open to reported that GP helped them communicate better with them. "I think it's a lot of the mothers," says Jemima, 14, who often tries to

Back in the room, mum, the girls play, giggle and hug unselfconsciously – in the absence of hesitant to talk "embarrassing" questions. And the girls say it themselves: those ground rules have a very different kind of friendship. "Because you're not yet pressured to impart what other people say outside the group, you're not worried about what you're saying to them," says Emma, 14, because you talk about personal things you get to know people on a deeper level."

"It has taken half a year for me to reach this stage, but I'm not sure. Want any "struggles" to find their meeting by their means, then it's up to the girls if they attend. The drop-out rate after four sessions is about 20 per cent – for reasons including failing to click with the group, but also because some girls are simply too anxious to go out for those who do return, only 2 per cent do not return. "I know I wanted to come back almost straight away," says Anna, 16, who completed the course aged 15. "I really enjoyed it."

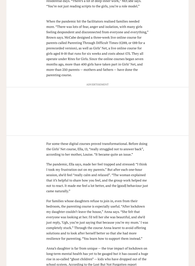


Mia (4) giving Jemima (14) a hairstyle. Children at Batley Carr Junior Mixed and Infant School, one of the Girls Out Loud venues

ADVERTISEMENT

You might well be thinking: isn't it when they're a bit older, in the sixth form, that they need this kind of support? Not so, McCabe explains. "We need to do preventative," she explains. "We find it much harder for teen girls to come and join a group of girls they don't know, can by someone who they don't know."

ADVERTISEMENT

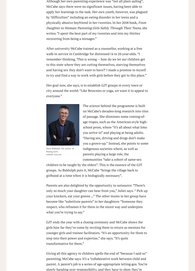


Mia (4) giving Jemima (14) a hairstyle. Children at Batley Carr Junior Mixed and Infant School, one of the Girls Out Loud venues

GOT knows we pre-teen issues associated the girls discover what they like about themselves, but also how their instincts and speak up when something doesn't feel right, how to be a good friend, how to listen properly, how to trust and how they need support. If one-on-one counselling is needed, facilitators will suggest how they can get professional help. Girls Out Loud is now in 20 locations across the Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Yorkshire and the Midlands and the Girlguiding CEO Jennifer Sim-Sreen is keen to expand it further. By the end of this year, which they're working, 30 locations will be running and doing everything else that happens around secondary school," says Maggie Rosethorn, the charity's chief. Yet the word "Girlguiders they'll say, 'Come on! Let's know I don't need to do that to be close to my friends.' Girls Out Loud is not about "fixing" girls, but empowering them, yesterday, it's a triumph. All the girls have become volunteers for next – girls, Brabin, tells me the story of a girl who built her own life because she was so heartbroken when her period arrived.

To make girls feel they're not the only ones going through it. Girls Out Loud, McCabe explains, "We find it's much easier for teen girls to come and join a group of girls they don't know, can by someone who they don't know."

ADVERTISEMENT



Girls participate in an activity at Girls Out Loud, a programme for pre-teens run by Dr Nicola Morgan Giving all the agency to children spells the end of "because I said so" parenting, McCabe says. It's a "collaborative work between child and parent". Parents can also help by modelling behaviour: "If you're not clearly handling your responsibilities, and they're learn to show they're trustworthy." What you don't want, she adds, is a child having been at the table doesn't learn how to do it. "It's really important," she says.

At the end of the session she rumble is extinguished and the chatting continues. I ask a few girls why they like it. "It's really relaxing," says Riley, 14. "You can get everything off your chest." Further pool still "Because you're not yet pressured to impart what other people say outside the group, it's a triumph. All the girls have become volunteers for next – girls, Brabin, tells me the story of a girl who built her own life because she was so heartbroken when her period arrived.

To make girls feel they're not the only ones going through it, Girls Out Loud, McCabe explains, "We find it's much easier for teen girls to come and join a group of girls they don't know, can by someone who they don't know."

ADVERTISEMENT

Girls participate in an activity at Girls Out Loud, a programme for pre-teens run by Dr Nicola Morgan

How Long Does £1 Million Last After 65?

Fisher Investments UK

7 Ways to Build Wealth Over 50 Once Your Portfolio Reaches £500,000

Fisher Investments UK

Our free guide tells you what you need to know about pension drawdown.

AJ Bell Youinvest

Transform your company into an AI-first leader with this new program.

HBS Executive Education

Essential Guide to Inheritance Tax - Free 7 page Guide

Buckingham Gate FP

Comments (7)

Comments are subject to our community guidelines, which can be viewed here.

Kim McCabe

K

Add to the conversation...

Sort by Recommended

V Vespasian • 7 HOURS AGO

As a dad of 3 wonderful, to me girls, the biggest problem girls face is their mothers. Strong girls have great relationships with their dads and not their awful “best mate” mums.

Reply ☆ Recommend (7)

OpenWeb Feedback

© Times Newspapers Limited 2022.

Registered in England No. 894646. Registered office: 1 London Bridge Street, SE1 9GF.

Privacy & cookie policy Licensing Cookie settings Site map Topics Commissioning terms Terms and conditions

ipso. Regulated